intelligence of the great event of the day will be onveyed to you by telegraph, before this reaches its I was ever confident in the belief, from he day the allies affected a successful landing at apatoria, that the fall of Sebastopol was inevitable, so uniformly expressed myself at Washington d elsewhere. The complete occupation of the rimea by the Allies, cannot now be long prevented. then this shall have been accomplished, then the s establishment of peace may ensue, but it will be grehased at ruinous rates by Russia. She will robably be required to defray the expenses of the war, to let Sebastopol remain a heap of "blood sained ruins," and not to re-enter the Black Sea with an armed marine, before her territory will be evacuated. To the less of her colossal prestige, impaired almost at the moment she commenced hostilibumiliation has been added to humiliation, until her name no longer inspires terror, or commands admiration even in second rate Powers. Never did a eler commit such a mistake as the late Czar in his memature desire to hasten the "end of the sick man." He could have maintained his position as and of the first nations of the earth without submiting his strength, or rather his weakness, to a practical test.

The intellect of Nicholas was of a gigantic nature, hat an unrestrained ambition-" that sin by which the angels fell "-misgoverned his better judgment, hurried him into eternity, he has involved his counin misfortunes which centuries cannot extricate it om. It is a remarkable fact, that the war is attrimable almost solely to the London Times, and is so regarded here in all well-informed circles. It asalled with an ability, scarcely surpassed by the pen Junius, the coup d'état of Louis Napoleon, and the mocities attendant thereon, which interpreted by or British sentiment, he seriously meditated a ostile demonstration against Great Britain. I have he hest of reasons for believing that when Droun de France, from his mission to the British Court, he and Louis Napoleon actively war-like disposed awards this realm, and that it was with the utmost ifficulty that he was dissuaded from his purpose. The Czar was aware of this, and, influenced by the allons and views expressed in the Times, together with the nature of the despatches received from day to day from his representatives, in support of the apposed influence wielded by the journal referred , he believed the formation of an entente cordiale between the two countries was impossible, and hence as subsequent action in the Principalities.

But England has committed even greater blunders than Russia. Her position to-day is but little better than that of a French dependency.
